

ABSTRACT

A process for forming sublithographic structures such as fins employs a hardmask protective layer above a hardmask to absorb damage during a dry etching step, thereby preserving symmetry in the hardmask and eliminating a source of defects.